

Make Your Workday With Lupus Easier

by BARBARA LEECH

---

Your Guide to a Lupus Workday

Most people can take a sick day when illness strikes, and pushing through their workday is more than they bear. But for those of us with lupus, that kind of illness can be an ongoing battle. Employers, particularly those who don't understand the disease, may be less than accommodating and perhaps even question if you are too sick to work.

With a disease that attacks invisibly from the inside in seemingly random, unpredictable ways, how do we continue to keep up with our jobs and deal with overwhelming health issues like heart, lung and kidney problems? We are warriors, but we are also human, and some days getting showered, dressed and out that door feels like taking on a triathlon.

Fight a Good Fight

There are things you can do to make your workday easier with lupus:

- If your job requires sitting for long periods, make it a point to get up and walk around every hour. Walk to the water cooler or move around and stretch, but remember that sitting at a computer for several uninterrupted hours is one of the worst things you can do for your joints, spine, vision and blood circulation.
- Eat healthy. No fast food or junk food snacks just because it is easier or you are strapped for time. Plan and bring a healthy lunch and snacks as well as plenty of water to drink.
- Revive yourself mid-day with snacks that boost energy. Nuts, baked sweet potato chips and dark chocolate can give a healthy boost to get through the rest of the workday.
- Fight brain fog with some soothing or white noise sounds that block out office chaos. Bring earbuds (if your job allows this) and plug into soft music or nature sounds that block the buzz of conversations and let you hear your own thoughts.
- Know your limits and explore your options. Many of us do not disclose that we have lupus to our employers for fear that it will, in turn, affect our jobs or promotions. But sometimes disclosing lupus is something we have to do. If you reach a point where you are worried about keeping your employment, it may be time to explore other job options.

If You Can't Fight It, Work Around It

Throughout my life with lupus, I have had numerous days where I wept in the shower in exhaustion and pain, cleaned myself up and went to work. Looking back now, I realize my lupus flared while I was pregnant and when I was serving as editor of two newspapers — more than a full-time position — so I know the struggle well.

I have had odd things happen to cause me to take time off, like bleeding behind the retina in my right eye, odd swelling and finally, issues with my pregnancy (my baby's heartbeat kept nearly stopping), all of which were hard to adequately explain to an employer.

---

---

Eventually, my baby's seizures after he was born, combined with postpartum depression and lupus-related health issues after giving birth, forced me to make a choice. I left the job behind and started over on my terms.

I began to freelance for a different newspaper from home, and though I still had deadlines to meet, I met many of them wearing yoga pants and a t-shirt, sitting at my kitchen counter with my baby in my arms.

I know this is not an option with many people's jobs, and to say it was easy to get enough assignments to pay the bills would be untrue. It was a struggle, and took about seven years before I felt I truly made the right choice.

For your lupus workday to go successfully, you must think creatively, like the survivors we are, regarding what lupus friendly jobs we can do that will at least partially accommodate our struggles with this disease.